The words Eastern and Oriental are synonyms. Yet in the 20th century they came to be used to distinguish the two major families of Orthodox churches that were estranged in the fifth-century over the proper understanding of Jesus Christ's divinity and humanity. A century of modern ecumenical dialogue has resulted in significant theological convergence but limited tangible union. In a major new book edited by Christine Chaillot, renowned ecumenists, theologians and clergy from all of the Orthodox Churches—including three from the Armenian Church—explore the remaining issues and seek to forge the path ahead.

Christine Chaillot is an internationally acclaimed and respected advocate of the full reconciliation of the Eastern Orthodox and the Oriental Orthodox Churches. She is the author of several articles and books on the life and spirituality of the churches of the two families and the history and progress of their ecumenical dialogue. She is the editor of an important collection of essays, just published, by scholars and clergy of both Orthodox families.
